Hi ABF,

During my time learning the trade I have often wondered....

- An accounting Firm is owned by Qualified Accountants.
- A Law Firm is owned by Qualified Lawyers.
- A General Practice is owned by qualified GP.

And this truly makes sense. There would be outrage if this were not the case....

What does not make sense, is that Corporate Customs Brokers Licenses can be owned/or run by people with no Qualifications.

I understand the "horse may have bolted" but has there been consideration to move in this direction?

Amongst other things, I suggest;

- If a Licensed Broker had to be a director / partner / shareholder (of significance), ensure the appropriate business decisions were being made around the board table as due consideration would be given if the decision makers were qualified.
- Would give a career path to young aspiring Brokers, creating a need and therefore commitment to the craft.
- Remove the, "previously we were concentrating on growing the business" remark that was thrown around last year.

Thanks for your time, hope this is of assistance.
